ABOUT THE THEME :

Environment protection and its sustainability is a global phenomenon. Right from the mother's womb, one needs unpolluted air to breathe, uncontaminated water to drink, nutritious food to eat and hygienic conditions to live in. These elements are sine qua non for sound development of human personality. In the absence of these man cannot grow to his fullest extent. Man, in order to survive adapts itself to its environment, but he rarely pays attention for its improvement. On the contrary, in the name of development and progress through industrial and agricultural revolutions, environment is being affected adversely day by day. Today, environmental pollution is a global problem that is inextricably linked with rapid industrialization and urbanization. The continuous increase in population has enhanced the density of population in various areas and this has created many social and psychological problems. Environmental sustainability has become increasingly crucial as we observe more dramatic weather changes, global warming and environmental degradation. As the world population grew, the need for more resources also increased. More industrial activities emerged around the world to meet the increasing demand for these resources. All of these efforts by countries, private organisations, non-governmental organisations, and the United Nations have made a significant contribution to public awareness of global environmental issues, resulting in a conscious effort at all levels to reduce the environmental impact of economic activities. Although these strategies and awareness have resulted in some success in terms of sustainable development, there is still a need to strengthen efforts. And these efforts will be successful on a large scale only if environmental sustainability is considered in conjunction with the social and economic impact on society. To achieve long-term development in society, it is essential to recognise that policies based solely on the environment, without taking into account other dimensions such as economic and social impact, would not accomplish any nation's long-term objectives. Environmental goals cannot be achieved for long in the midst of an unhealthy economy, and economic activity based on a deteriorating environment is unlikely to be sustainable. Although achieving the appropriate balance might be challenging, but the best way to sustainable development is to integrate environmental, economic, and social policies.
